ABSTRACT

This dictionary covers approximately 28,277 verbal expressions in modern standard Hindi and their rendered English equivalents. The study lists longer verbal expressions which are generally matched by single verbs in English. The lexicographer notes that the majority of entries in this dictionary do not appear in their present form in most other monolingual or bilingual dictionaries. Entries have been selected according to linguistic difficulty and student needs. Hindi expressions having a unitary conceptual status are rendered to their English equivalent, thereby overcoming linguistic and semantic problems the student and teacher of modern standard Hindi frequently encounter. A Dictionary of Hindi Verbal Expressions 1 - 1083

INTRODUCTION

1. A Dictionary of Hindi Verbal Expressions consists of 1083 pages covering approximately 28,277 verbal expressions in modern standard Hindi (MSH) along with their meanings in English. The primary contribution of this work to the tradition of Hindi lexicography can be summed up by the following points:-

(i) It is the first work of its kind which lists verbal expressions longer than single lexical items which are generally matched by single verbs in English.

(ii) A great majority of the entries of this dictionary do not appear in monolingual as well as bilingual (i.e., Hindi-English) dictionaries of Hindi, although individual words forming these expressions are reported.

(iii) Each entry in this dictionary has been carefully selected keeping in mind the needs and the difficulties of the student of the language.

(iv) Though this dictionary is by no means exhaustive, we believe, it goes a long way to satisfy the needs of the English speaking student of Hindi by providing him with the equivalents in English of the Hindi expressions which, though complex, have nevertheless a unitary conceptual status at some level of the Hindi semantic structure.

The last point, which in our opinion is probably the most significant of the four ways in which A Dictionary of Hindi Verbal Expressions contributes to the tradition of Hindi lexicography, needs some elaboration and explanation, especially in the light of the current trends in linguistics very aptly characterized by the late Uriel Weinreich as "a linguistics preoccupied with productivity in the strongest, Chomskyan sense,..."[1] In other words, this dictionary brings into focus phraseological units of Hindi for which a linguist "sees no way, for the present, to give a thoroughly satisfactory treatment "[2] in a generative-transformational grammar. At the same time, this dictionary makes a modest beginning by listing and suggesting the English equivalents of a large number of phraseological units of Hindi and is designed to draw the attention of the language teacher, who in his analytical vein has so far failed to grasp the significance of these phraseological units in the semantic structure of Hindi, resulting in his imperfect (sometimes even erroneous) understanding of the language.

We would like to emphasize that the verbal expression included in this dictionary should not be confused with idiomatic expressions. The bulk of verbal expressions in this dictionary can best be characterized (again using Uriel Weinreich's words) by the terms "phraseological units" or "stable collocations" which have a unitary status at some level in the semantic structure of Hindi by virtue of their occurrence in relatively stable collocations, but not because of their idiomaticity. Because of this self-imposed restriction to include verbal expressions occurring in only relatively stable collocations, it was considered necessary to evolve some criteria for determining the length of these phraseological units for inclusion as verbal expression in this dictionary. A native speaker's intuition is probably the foremost criterion applicable in such a situation. But his intuitive judgements do involve some objective basis which must be explicated, especially when one is dealing with two languages. Therefore, the major criterion we have employed for determining the length of the dictionary entries is briefly described below.

2. We have tried to include all such complex phraseological units of Hindi which are renderable in English in any one context by a single verb, e.g., the entry vāstavikatā se kama āṇkanā "to underrate". Such a decision, however ad hoc it may seem on the surface, follows (at least for the purpose of our dictionary) from an important distinction in the grammatical structure of the two languages. This distinction can be illustrated by the following example. The phraseological unit just cited, i.e., vāstavikatā se kama āṇkanā takes as its object nouns involving a reference to their usefulness, value, superiority or the like. The English verb "to underrate" as it occurs in the sentence "human nature is consistently underrated in business,"[3] requires specification of the selectional constraints on the occurrence of nouns as its object, i.e., in order to generate grammatical sentences with the verb "to underrate" it is necessary to indicate at some point in the grammar of English that this verb permits the occurrence of nouns as its object marked for the semantic feature usefulness, value, superiority, etc. For our purpose it does not concern us as to how this selectional constraint should be systematically incorporated in a grammar of English, or whether or not this is the best possible way of handling this problem. What is important for our purpose is that there exists a parallel between English and Hindi in this respect. Instead of requiring a specification by marking the nouns as to their semantic features for the purpose of imposing selectional constraints on them, Hindi requires an express lexical specification of the semantic features in a sentence. This is illustrated by the Hindi rendering of the above noted English sentence.

> vyāvasāyika kṣetro me sadā manusya kī prakṛti kā mūlya > vāstavikatā se kama āṇka jātā hai.

A comparison between these related expressions in English and Hindi reveals that the expression "human nature" occurring as the object of the verb "to underrate" is matched in the Hindi sentence by the expression "manuṣya kī prakṛti kā mūlya". In other words, what is accomplished in a description of the structure of English by imposing selectional constraints on the occurrence of nouns as the object of the verb "to underrate" by requiring them to have markings for the feature usefulness etc., is also required in a systematic description of Hindi. However, Hindi fulfills this requirement in a very different way, i.e., by requiring an express lexical specification of the semantic feature by a term (as in the present case the Hindi noun mūlya "value, usefulness etc."). This distinction between imposition of selectional constraints by means of specifying the underlying semantic features of nouns in English, on the one hand, and the imposition of selectional constraints on the object nouns through a lexical specification of the semantic features, i.e., by their occurrence in environments like the one illustrated by the example kā mūlya in Hindi, on the other, constitutes a very significant difference in the surface representations of the semantic structures of these two languages. At the same time, it provides a basis for imposing restrictions on the length of the Hindi dictionary entries by enabling us to choose between one of the two possibilities, i.e., mūlya vāstavikatā se kama āṇkanā/vāstavikatā se kama āṇkanā. We can now state this criterion by saying that wherever a selectional constraint on the occurrence of lexical items in a given environment in English is matched in Hindi by an express lexical specification of the semantic feature, the Hindi entry in the dictionary will be limited to the phraseological unit minus the word specifying the semantic feature.
